

TikTok Engagement Hacks

More secrets the Guru's don't want you to know...

Engagement Cheat Code 1:

- > Go to TikTok
- > Tap “Settings and Privacy”
- > Head to “Comments”
- > Choose “Filter keywords”

In this section, start adding the phrases and words your audience comments most often—especially the negative ones, repetitive catchphrases, or anything that could hurt your brand's image.

Let's say you post hyper-realistic AI-generated content. No matter how real it looks, there's always that one person zooming in, hunting for flaws, and pointing out “this is AI.” Once that happens, others join in and the illusion breaks. You want to get ahead of that.

Here's the genius part: TikTok will still count those filtered comments toward your engagement. They're just hidden from public view unless you approve them.

Why does this boost your reach? Because when someone thinks they're the first to “expose” your content, they comment—unaware that 50 others already tried but were filtered. This repetition feeds the algorithm like wildfire and skyrockets your post's visibility. Most top creators use this hack, follow them!

Engagement Cheat Code 2:

Here's one of the most underrated growth hacks I've personally used to go viral multiple times on TikTok — and the crazy part? It costs nothing.

Step 1: Post your video and let it sit for 5–10 minutes

Step 2: Grab a second phone (or use a different device or account not linked to your main one)

Step 3: Head to your video and drop a comment — but don't make it random. Ask a question that creates a divide. Something opinion-based. Something that triggers people to take a side.

Step 4: Switch back to your main account and reply to that comment — start debating. Literally argue with yourself if you have to. Stir the pot.

Step 5: Once people start jumping in, keep it going. Reply to them from both accounts. Fuel the conversation. Fan the flames. You'll rack up 5–10+ comments in minutes.

(Make sure you aren't connected to the same WiFi, use 4G if needed)

This works like a charm. I've used it repeatedly — and I'm telling you, it never fails.

The psychology behind it is simple: most people don't want to be the first to comment. They'll scroll past unless they see others already talking. People are way more likely to engage when they feel like they're joining an existing discussion instead of starting one from scratch.

By planting those early comments and sparking a mini-debate, you're hacking the algorithm's engagement signals. TikTok sees the activity — replies, likes, interactions — and flags your video as active. That signal can be the difference between a video that caps at 300 views and one that shoots past 10k+.

And the key is timing. TikTok gives you a short window (usually the first 1–2 hours) where early engagement matters a lot. That's your golden opportunity to get noticed — and this tactic gives you a way to manufacture momentum before the crowd arrives.

Don't underestimate this. Start doing it consistently and watch what happens to your reach.

Engagement Cheat Code 3:

Following on from the last cheatcode...

Most people upload their video... maybe reply to one or two comments... and then bounce. Big mistake.

What you should do instead: Treat every single comment like it's the start of a conversation — especially in the first 60 minutes.

Once you've posted your video and go the comments rolling in from your own commenting, set a 1-hour timer. During that window, your only job is to engage. Hard.

The second someone comments — anything, even if it's “🔥” or “lol” — reply instantly.

Don't just say “thanks.” Turn it into a thread. Ask a follow-up. React with a twist. Make a joke. Say something unexpected.

Repeat this with every comment. Your goal? Turn 1 comment into 3 or 4. Create tiny little micro-conversations all over your video.

If someone's being negative? Even better. Keep it respectful, but go back and forth with them. Other people will jump in. You're feeding the beast.

Think about it — when TikTok sees 20 people comment, but the comment count says 70, it's because you worked the section like a pro. The algorithm doesn't know who's who — it just sees engagement spiking early and starts pushing your content out wider.

Engagement Cheat Code 4:

I've mentioned it earlier on in the course, but here's one of the sneakiest TikTok growth tricks that's worked for me more times than I can count:

Make a small, subtle mistake on purpose, or include something that is so out of place that people can't help but correcting it.

Yeah, seriously.

Step 1: Post a video like normal — could be AI, educational, storytelling, opinion-based, anything

Step 2: Somewhere in the video (best option), text, speech, or captions, insert a “mistake” — just enough to trigger the viewer's urge to correct you

Step 3: Sit back and let the comments roll in as people try to “educate” you, little do they know that you are one step ahead

This can be as simple as:

Putting a Nike logo on a shoe, in a video that's meant to be in 1950

Saying a quote wrong (“Einstein invented gravity”)

Messing up a date (“The internet was created in 1995”)

Misnaming something (“This is Saturn” when it's clearly Jupiter)

Adding a random giraffe for a split second in the background

Misspelling a basic word in a caption (“Your” instead of “you're”)

Now, here's why this works like crack for engagement:

Most people scroll past videos without commenting. But the second they spot something “wrong,” their ego kicks in. They have to say something. It's a reflex.

They feel smart for noticing, so they drop a comment calling it out.

And when one person does it, others join in.

You just created a debate zone without needing to ask for anything. Every “correction” counts as a comment — even the snarky or rude ones. And TikTok doesn't care if the engagement is negative or positive. It just sees activity and pushes your video harder.

You can even double down:

- Respond to corrections with vague replies like “Are you sure?” or “That’s what I read online” to stir it up more
- Like their comment but don’t correct yourself in the caption — it keeps the loop going

Important: The “mistake” has to be believable. If it’s too obvious or too fake, it looks like bait and might turn people off. The goal is to just barely trigger people into correcting you.

This strategy is especially powerful for educational or history-based content, storytelling, AI content, or “Did you know?” type videos.

You’re basically using the audience’s own ego to boost your content.

And once it starts? It snowballs. A video with 100 comments correcting your “error” is now getting boosted like crazy — all because you “accidentally” said Mars was the fourth planet from the sun instead of the third.

Welcome to comment baiting, done smart.
